How do consumers evaluate total usage? When considering their anticipated happiness, do they weigh expected duration and frequency of use equally, given both make the same objective contribution to total usage and cost-per-use? This research finds that consumers are more sensitive to usage duration than frequency. We propose that this asymmetry is partly driven by differences in the strength of consumers’ prior expectations: people associate usage frequency primarily with user characteristics (diffuse expectations), but associate usage duration with both user and product characteristics (stronger baseline expectations). These stronger expectations lead to greater sensitivity to duration than frequency.
